Chapter One: Jubilee Preparations

It was a beautiful, sunny day as the queen woke up in her monumental palace and thought about how fabulous the Platinum Jubilee celebration would be that was happening in the next couple of days as she gazed at the astounding view of London and the stunning structures and buildings, decorated gaily with lovely historical Union Jacks.

She would have dedicated 70 years of service to Great Britain, overseeing 14 prime ministers in the time that she had been queen.

Two days before the celebrations, the Queen was having a “dress rehearsal” just to make sure that she was comfortable and that everything was in order.

Her maid helped her into her luxurious, expensive clothes and jewels, but suddenly noticed that the most precious jewel of all was gone! The priceless netherite and diamond crown – passed down to the Queen from her beloved father, King George, making this jewel the most important and precious jewel in the world – was nowhere to be found!

When the maid told the Queen the unfortunate news about her missing crown, she almost fainted from shock!

Diamonds were not so important; the important thing was the netherite. It cost £1,000,000,000 (1 billion pounds), and only one royal family owned it – this one!

To make matters worse, only 38 pieces of netherite had ever been found in royal history.

And do you know what was even worse? It had been successfully passed down from so many generations and Elizabeth just didn't want to be the one person to lose it.

The Queen felt terrible that the crown had been taken. She remembered the moment she had received it from her father and thought sadly that William and his son George wouldn't have the pleasure of wearing it.

She ambled slowly downstairs to eat her breakfast, turning on the TV thinking it would cheer her up, but it did the complete opposite!

The only thing that was being talked about on all the channels was, of course, the Platinum Jubilee happening in two days' time, and even though it was going to be an amazing event with thousands of street parties, she didn't have her crown, and she would have to tell everyone she had lost the rarest crown in the whole of history!

The worry was gobbling her up like a black hole.

After breakfast, she complained of a stomach ache and had to hold on to the sideboard to just walk or stand.

Her advisors and maids were worried about her, and nothing suggested by the resident doctor, who had been treating her for decades, seemed to work.

Chapter Two: The Reward

The next day the chief secretary announced that whoever could heal Her Majesty would get a grand reward of £10,000, so that evening 195 of the best doctors were flown in from around the world to help her but without success.

They said she had an unknown illness that could probably not be cured unless a miracle happened.

The Queen gave up in despair. The best doctors from all over the world had tried to heal her but none of them could.

Chapter Three: The Search

Despite her stomach pains, the Queen ordered 900 of her best guards to find the missing crown and capture the thief, reminding them that they had a deadline of 2 days before the actual Jubilee.

Her Royal Head Secretary was put in charge of “The Search”.

“You have two days to find the jewel thief. The thief is probably the best there is, so we need our best people on the case! A man in black clothing was seen by one of our guards running into the streets towards Big Ben so jump into your cars and find that thief!!!” the Royal Head Secretary ordered.

While the guards went in search of the crown thief, the news of the reward for curing the Queen got out, so several less than honest people unfortunately decided to take advantage of the opportunity and came forward to try and heal the Queen.

Among those who offered their services was a young, wellbuilt man.

Chapter Four: The Miracle Cure

When he got there he was questioned like everyone else but when they asked him where he came from, he mysteriously answered, “Nowhere and everywhere...”

The Queen was in her room, worried, when she heard something:

THUD Thud thud, and then... BANG!!!!

The Queen jumped in fright, but it was just another doctor who had entered her private room.

He strolled into the huge room, bowing low. "Hello Your Majesty," he said, introducing himself. " I am Dr Beast and I have come with an incredible pill that has taken many magical potions to make, to heal Your Majesty."

"Don't bother yourself, many people have tried to make me feel better but none have succeeded. I feel the exact same as before, if not worse..." the Queen explained sulkily, but the doctor wasn't going to hear any of it.

"Here, take this special pill with the right amount of everything you need to be cured," the doctor explained. The Queen thought that he had gone crazy but decided she had no choice but to take it.

Then the doctor gave the queen the “special” pill and a large glass of water to wash it down as he remarked that she was healed and would soon feel a lot better!

She thanked the doctor and gave him his grand prize of £15,000. She had given him £5000 more as he had really healed her with one pill. He was delighted and skipped out of the palace.

After that brilliant encounter, the Queen was overjoyed as she now felt much better, but there still was one big problem: the missing crown. She knew she had sent the best guards to find the jewel so she would just have to wait and see, and hope it would be found in time.

Chapter Five: The Lucky Find

“He was such a nice, smart, and kind man.” the Queen said.

“ Are you talking about the doctor?” The maid asked.

“Yes, I indeed am, he must be extremely smart to find out all the formulae to make that magical pill.” replied the Queen.

The Royal head nurse who had come to check on Her Majesty, tripped over the doctor’s bag near her chair and wanted to give it back but he was already long gone, so the Queen opened the bag hoping to find his ID to send it on, but instead, she found something even better..

THE LEGENDARY CROWN. “What... but... how...?”

The Queen was speechless.

“Never mind the confusing event and what just happened, we have a Platinum Jubilee to prepare for!”

The Queen declared happily.

The sun's rays illuminated every single room. The maids were all dancing around the palace merrily while preparing the Queen's outfits for every special day of the celebration and most importantly, the queen looked so happy and well.

Chapter Six: Celebrations At Last!

Finally, the special day arrived. Her Majesty the Queen opened her eyes, her tummy filled with butterflies but her heart full of happiness. Once again, looking out of the enormous palace windows and admiring the beauty of the city, she thought what an incredible day this was going to be. Just a minute later the sun hid behind the clouds as it rained cats and dogs and Britain showed its casual rainy weather, except this time was special as if the clouds were blessing us.

The corgis were all running around the room, picking up on the general excitement. Then, with a gentle knocking on the door, the maid opened it to all the Queen's grandchildren singing a special song for her and the Queen was putting her excellent voice to use and singing along with them, even the young Lilibeth joined in.

As the Queen had been enjoying her special time with her family, there were thousands of street parties around the United Kingdom. People celebrating with family and friends, and neighbours who had never met before danced and laughed together.

Buckingham Palace unveiled a full lineup of celebrations to mark the Queen's Platinum Jubilee with an incredible concert of music, singing, and dancing.

Do you think the corgis had been left out of the celebration? Well of course not. They had the most fun in their whole lives, as well as being proud of the Queen and celebrating the Queen's Platinum Jubilee, and also they received so many amazing toys and presents as well as beautiful outfits and a customised crown and of course all the colorful sweets, yummmm.

Buckingham Palace was brimming outside with hundreds and thousands of people chanting, chatting, and cheering for the Queen as the musicians played the National Anthem as the Queen stood proud on her balcony, surrounded by her close family and smiling with joy.

Back home, The thief was extremely happy, remembering how he had tricked the Queen and stolen her crown!

He was dreaming about being rich and driving his customized-made car around the world. But something didn't feel right. Where was his doctor's bag? He was so angry at himself – he would have to go back!

The clever thief then joined the stream of the happy celebrating crowd moving towards Buckingham Palace.

This was such an amazing experience – like no other that he ever had before. “All this is only a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to celebrate our lovely Queen’s Jubilee.” he thought. From a distance, he could see the Queen on her balcony dressed in her beautiful, fresh, green outfit. She looked so amazingly happy joined by her family.

Soon, the concert started. Everyone was shouting and singing with Adam Lambert and Queen while Paddington had tea and marmalade sandwiches with the Queen herself – unbelievable, lucky Paddington! It was like a fairy story.

The thief had forgotten all about his plan to get the jewels as he was joining the crowds of people and celebrating while listening to Ed Sheeran singing.

He sang along too, with his amazing voice which surprised the people around him, without knowing that he was actually surrounded by professional musicians, the best from the country. They wanted to know more about him and invited him to their studios to record a song with Ed Sheeran. How amazing was that! So he no longer needed to steal, he became a wealthy and popular singer.

The jubilee celebration was one of its kind and the concert was excellent. The concert was started by Queen and (Adam Lambert) and included Diana Ross, Ed Sheeran, Rod Stewart, and more fabulous singers.

The Queen and the citizens of Britain celebrated for four whole days of feasts, parties, and ceremonies, and most importantly everything went even better than the Queen herself could have imagined.
